About the Author

Stuart Harris graduated with a BSEE from Princeton University, MSEE from the University of Pennsylvania and MBA from Stanford University. He managed market research at American Microsystems Inc, Fairchild Semiconductor and National Semiconductor, then authored market research reports for Gnostic Concepts, Dataquest and Tier One.

In 2001 Mr. Harris began to apply market research techniques to archaeology, taking advantage of the wildcard searching capability of the web. While tracking a tsunami across the Atlantic to Europe, he encountered Felice Vinci, who had documented a Bronze Age Greek civilization in the Baltic. In 1260 BC, a cometary impact followed by an extended freeze forced many survivors to migrate south toward the warmer Mediterranean, which they found nearly deserted as a result of the same catastrophe. They settled and re-named cities and geographic features after their Baltic homeland. Vinci proposed that Troy would be found near Troija in southwest Finland, and encouraged Mr. Harris to look for it.

In this endeavor he learned to read and write Finnish. In 2004 he recognized a word tulos meaning 'total' on a tablet written in the unknown language called Linear A from Minoan Crete. This led to decipherment of Linear A, and then to decipherment of Old European and related languages.
